What Are Cookies?

Cookies are tiny data files that are generated by a website and saved on your computer by the web browser. They can be used for a variety of reasons including customising a website for a specific user, aiding a user to navigate the website, improving the user's experience of the website, or even storing a user's preferences or log-in information.

Types of Cookies

- Essential cookies are those that are required in order a website or service on a website that you have requested to be provided; or those that are used solely to facilitate the transmission of communications over a network
- Non-essential cookies are all those that fall outside of the definition of essential cookies. These include cookies that are used to analyse user behaviour on a website (analytical cookies) or those that are used to display advertisements (advertising cookies).
- Session cookies are those that remain until your browser is closed. When you close your browser, the cookies expire.
- Persistent cookies are those that only expire after a fixed period of time or when they are manually deleted.
- First party cookies are those that are placed by the website domain.
- Third party cookies are those that are placed by third party website domains.
